Thistle Systems has enabled one of Scotland's fastest growing tech companies to double its office space in its existing premises, avoiding the need and costs associated with building new larger offices.

Thistle had initially been appointed to install some glass partitioning but when the client started outlining the space challenges they faced, our Specialist Interiors Project Manager discussed the opportunities available by maximising the available height in their existing premises with a mezzanine floor.

The company was looking for a solution which created a bright, attractive and modern space which would enable them to attract high calibre staff whilst also encouraging collaboration between its core teams which had traditionally worked in their own offices.

Thistle presented some initial ideas for a mezzanine floor which transformed the industrial unit along with a cost analysis and 3D visuals of how it could look.

The client quickly recognised the impact the project could have and the massive savings it could achieve by not having to build a new office and asked for the mezzanine to be doubled in size.

On the first floor of the mezzanine, Thistle's creative interiors team developed a solution which opened up the entire area with 4 new windows cut into the fabric of the existing building to let in the natural light.

Glass partitioning was used to give the feel of an open plan area whilst creating a dedicated work space with 16 additional desk positions, a large meeting room with four project rooms which could be used as breakout areas.

At the heart of the offices was an open plan kitchen area which was designed to encourage collaboration as well as providing an informal meeting area for discussing projects, ideas and innovation.

High level and seated touch down areas were created to provide their external sales team with a work space when they were required in the office, however, these areas could also be used for informal meetings and collaborations between the internal teams.

A dedicated communications room was also created to accommodate their IT systems.
